This is a recent picture of the man who made $5000 in one month with a Cripette machine. He is a star window.

As the Twig Is Bent

double old gentleman who observed her remarked to himself, Antonia and the portly broker passed by to a remote and dimly lighted corner. They were out of ear-shot, though he could hear the constant murmur of their voices. He gathered from the sound, and from what he could see of their attitudes, that the man was addressing a long and impassioned speech to her, which Antonia interrupted only occasionally by a word or gesture.

Even at that distance he could see that her eyes were extraordinarily large and brilliant. She looked as tense and excited as the bishop felt himself to be. A motor-car slid silently under the lights of the porte-cochère at the other end of the porch, and stopped. The bishop saw a gentleman in evening dress emerge from the tonneau and stand for a moment under the brilliant electric lights. They showed him to have a serious, honest face, the sight of which gave the bishop the sensation of being awakened from a nightmare to the most comforting of daylight scenes.

He turned instinctively to see if the couple beyond him had also noticed the arrival. He caught only a flutter of scarlet and white as Antonia flashed by him—Antonia, bounding, long-limbed, like a panther down the porch, her skirts caught high, her glittering scarf dragging behind her.

"What devilry is she up to now?" thought the old gentleman, startled and apprehensive.

Leaning forward, he could see that she had had time for but the briefest monosyllabic colloquy with her fiancé before the door to the ballroom opened, and a crowd of dancers poured out upon the porch at the end of a dance. For a time they hid the two from the bishop's anxious eye, and he was reduced to conjecturing from the laughter and loud, ejaculatory talk that they were finding Antonia even more entertaining than usual.

"She is capable," he thought despairingly, "of taking this occasion for announcing Percy's loss and her engagement to the broker!"

Suddenly, from out the laughing uproar around the two, Antonia's voice arose. She was shouting:

"Uncle Bishop! Uncle Bishop! You're needed!"

One of the young men came running back toward him, grinning widely.

"She's a corker," he cried. "By Jove! You never know what she means, or what she'll be up to next!"

"What is she doing now?" asked the bishop, rising and moving toward the crowd.

"And what can she want of me?"

"Lord knows!" his young attendant answered to both these questions. "She told me to go and get you. She's giving away all her things to the girls, and laughing like mad about how furious her aunt'll be!"

When the bishop arrived, Antonia, stripped of her rings and bracelets and fan, the gold bandeau gone from her black hair, the pearls from her dazzling neck, had just discovered her scarf clinging about her feet.

"Here, Lolly, here's a keepsake for you, if you did get here late! I'd give you my dress if it weren't for the looks of the thing!"

"What are you up to?" asked the girl who had just joined the group.

Antonia snatched the long, black overcoat from her fiancé's arm, and extinguished in its severe masculine lines the red and white of her costume.

"I'm taking the veil!" she said. "Percy, give me a handkerchief to tie over my hair!" Seeing the bishop's haggard old face over the heads of those about her, she went on: "We are going to take the bishop in the car. Percy and I, and dash over the State-line, where you don't have to have a license. We're going to get married! The dear bishop, who loves me so warmly, is going to marry us!" She laughed at the spectacle of stupefaction presented to her by her uncle-to-be. "We have a secret between us, my Uncle Bishop and I. He knows that I won't need in my future life any of the vain gauds I've been showering on you!"

She seized her fiancé's hand, and his uncle's, and ran down the porch, dragging both men after her, and shouting over her shoulder to the burst of talk which followed them:

"No, you don't all come after us in motorcars to celebrate. I'll stand on the back seat and pick you off one by one with Percy's revolver if you try to! I've changed my mind, and I'm going to have a marriage instead of a wedding!"
